

Fig. 1. Components of a “traditional” particle physics experiment. Each particle type has its own signature in the detector. For example, if a particle is detected only in the electromagnetic calorimeter, it is fairly certain that it is a photon.